Gundalows were once the dominant cargo bearers of the Piscataqua River, moving supplies throughout the river basin of New Hampshire and Maine. For more than two hundred years, from colonial times through the nineteenth century, gundalows formed an indispensable link in a transportation network embracing over a thousand square miles of inland waters, from the river ports to Portsmouth on the seacoast. During their heyday, more than two thousand gundalows were built in this region. Without the Piscataqua gundalow, the development and growth of the entire basin would have been severely hampered. The gundalow was a symbol of its age, just as the railroad, the motor truck, and the jet airplane represent later ones. Today the gundalow is gone, a victim of technological displacement. But at its zenith, this specialized vessel was superior to any other carrier.

In this, the first book-length study of the gundalow, author Richard E. Winslow III traces the evolution of the gundalow's design, reviews its history and uses, and tells the stories of the colorful men who made their living from its decks.
