Everything In Its Place - A Short Story Miriam Gitlin

Excerpt:

I narrowed my eyes at her. “My girls are wonderful. They’ll be thrilled at the opportunity for this kind of mitzvah. And about the money— we’ll... we’ll just make do. I already spoke it over with Dovid. We’re more than ready to tighten our belts for the chance to have Mommy with us.”

“I’m sure you all are...” She drifted off, and started playing with the strap on her pocketbook. I knew she was thinking, rolling the words over in her head, trying to find the right ones. She looked back up at me.

“But how do you think Mommy would feel about inconveniencing you like that?” I opened my mouth and she cut me off before I had a chance to get started. “Even though I know you’re more than happy to do it. You can’t deny that it will be hard. Really hard.”

“But it’s not! I don’t think so, and Mommy won’t either! Why completely upend your entire home when she can move into my spare room without kicking anyone out? And I work from home anyway, so I could always be there for her, without anyone taking a loss of income. This isn’t about being the favorite daughter, it’s about who has the best situation, and I know how much you want her to come to you, but I don’t think you’re going to convince anyone that it’s ideal!”

She just didn’t seem to get it.

“It’s more than that, Henny. It’s also about where she’ll be happy. Where she’ll be comfortable. And—“ I sighed, bit my lip, and trudged on. “I really don’t think that’s going to happen by you.”

“What on earth do you mean by that?”

Could she really not know?

I sat and blinked and just looked at her. She was waiting for an answer. But I couldn’t bring myself to say it out loud.

The Stefansky girls are all grown up, but when it comes time to decide which one of them their elderly mother will be moving in with, old tensions rise to the surface as the sisters clash. While Henny insists that Mommy come to her, Elisheva knows there’s a very serious problem with that.

But telling Henny what that problem is could destroy their relationship... and her sister.
